Microgrids and Energy Storage
11:45 a.m. - 12:45 p.m.

Public acceptance of and demand for renewable energy has made possible non-traditional energy generation and distribution models that further efficiency, diversity and carbon emission reduction preferences of the modern consumer. The hybrid model, for example, might be a mix of solar, wind and battery storage to smoothen intermittency periods. The speakers in this session are mayors and consultants, all with direct experience with microgrids. They will be answering the questions of whether or not these types of non-traditional energy delivery systems are real, and are they being financed. Mayors want to know if microgrids can satisfy local electricity demand in their communities, and at what scale must they be to succeed financially.
